Joel Fung, the paper's editor, says that working for a newspaper is "like a fever." Since we're looking ahead to next semester in this issue of the Sentinel, it's the perfect time to check in with our student journalists. Next year will begin an exciting new English Minor in Journalism, but many of your peers are already enrolled. The renovated newsroom in 1535N. The room has six computers, a couch, a microwave, a refrigerator, and a copy machine. The room is also equipped with a coffee maker and snacks. The room is open to students who want to learn more about journalism, practice their skills, or just hang out. Joel Fung, the paper's editor, says that working for a newspaper is "like a fever."

Fall Course Preview

This week I have been reading my English 235 professor's syllabus. I wasn't aware until I signed up for a journalism class, and it presented an opportunity. The class is called "English Matters," and it will focus on the role of language in modern American culture. Possible authors may include James Baldwin, Langston Hughes, and August Wilson. We will focus on Hughes and calling attention to an ongoing struggle for freedom, equality, respect and justice. We will also discuss general is-...
